

Facebook presents itself as a platform for connection, a place where people can build communities, share their lives, and stay in touch with friends and family. But beneath the surface lies a system of surveillance, control, and exploitation. My investigation reveals that Facebook isn't user-friendly. It's user-hostile. Facebook's Terms of Service are a one-sided legal document. Users grant Meta a worldwide, perpetual, and transferable license to their content. Meta can use users' names and likenesses for advertising without compensation. The liability cap is effectively zero. This isn't a fair agreement. It's a shield for Meta. Facebook's Privacy Policy is a framework for data exploitation. Meta collects vast amounts of personal information: posts, photos, messages, location, device data, biometric information. This data is used for targeted advertising and AI training. Consent isn't meaningful, it's a trap. Facebook's moderation system is a mess. Automated AI flags content without context. The appeals process is weak and, for account suspensions, locked behind a paywall. This isn't moderation, it's punishment. Facebook's account termination system is a weapon. Accounts can be terminated without warning. All content is deleted permanently. There is no real appeals process for non-paying users. This isn't a fair system, it's a tool of control. Facebook's appeals process isn't a right, it's a privilege that can be purchased. Non-paying users have no way to contest account suspensions. This is discrimination. This is a protection racket. Facebook isn't a platform for connection. It's a platform for control. The Terms of Service, Privacy Policy, moderation, and termination systems are all designed to protect Meta's interests, not its users. Users aren't customers, they are sources of data to be exploited. The appeals process is a paywall. The system is broken, and it's broken by design. Facebook is underestimating the law and the mass of lawsuits. Their practices are legally vulnerable. Users are angry. The evidence is documented. The truth is published. Facebook can't hide forever.
